The One Question Interview

Specific task: Can you please describe the task, challenge, project, or problem?

Measurable: What actually changed, or can you measure your performance somehow?

Action: What did you actually do and what was your specific role?

Result: What was the actual result achieved and/or what was the deliverable?

Timeframe: When did this take place and how long did it take?

environment: What was the environment like in terms of pace, resources, level of sophistication, the people involved, and your manager?

What single project or task would you consider the most significant accomplishment in your career so far?

To see why this simple question is so powerful, imagine you're the candidate and I've just asked you this question. What accomplishment would you select? Then imagine over the course of the next 15-20 minutes I dug deeper and asked you about the following. How would you respond?

- ❖ Can you give me a detailed overview of the accomplishment?
- ❖ Tell me about the company, your title, your position, your role, and the team involved.
- ❖ What were the actual results achieved?
- ❖ When did it take place and how long did the project take?
- ❖ Why were you chosen?
- ❖ What were the 3-4 biggest challenges you faced and how did you deal with them?
- ❖ Where did you go the extra mile or take the initiative?
- ❖ Walk me through the plan, how you managed to it, and if it was successful.
- ❖ Describe the environment and resources.
- ❖ Describe your manager's style and whether you liked it or not.
- ❖ Describe the technical skills needed to accomplish the objective and how they were used.
- ❖ Some of the biggest mistakes you made.
- ❖ Aspects of the project you truly enjoyed.
- ❖ Aspects you didn't especially care about and how you handled them.
- ❖ How you managed and influenced other, with lots of examples.
- ❖ How you changed and grew as a person.
- ❖ What you would do differently if you could do it again.
- ❖ What type of formal recognition did you receive?

One Question Interview

If the accomplishment was comparable to a real job requirement, and if the answer was detailed enough to take 15-20 minutes to complete, consider how much an interviewer would know about your ability to handle the job. The insight gained from this type of question would be remarkable. But the real issue is not the question, this is just a setup.

The details underlying the accomplishment are what's most important. This is what real interviewing is about – getting into the details and comparing what the candidate has accomplished in comparison to what needs to be accomplished.

Don't waste time asking a lot of clever questions during the interview, or box checking their skills and experiences: spend time learning to get the answer to just this one question.

As you'll discover you'll then have all of the information to prove to other interviewers that their assessments were biased, superficial, emotional, too technical, intuitive or based on whether they liked the candidate or not.

Getting the answer to this one question is all it takes.
